ABSTRACT

Main archaeological articles and books from China that have been published from 1949 through 1965 are translated and compiled in bibliographic form. Because there is a lack of materials available to Western scholars of Chinese studies, the authors see these items as necessary resources for the understanding of Chinese civilization and the development of world civilization even though most of them are written in Chinese. The index covers Chinese civilization from prehistoric times to the Ming Dynasty (1368-1644) It is arranged chronologically by time period and dynasty, with subdivisions by geopolitical area. For each subdivision, the entries are arranged according to the publication date. To facilitate use of the index, a chart showing the chronology of Chinese civilization, a list of the geopolitical subdivisions of China, and a map that shows location of subdivisions and the main rivers and cities are provided. PREFACE

At a time when certain segments of this country are reacting to a movement which they believe is isolationism and saying we need to maintain our ties with the world, we could suggest that for more than twenty years most Americans have been isolated from the cultural aspects of some Asian countries. Although the Korean War and our involvement in Vietnam have provided military and political "exchanges", the cultural aspects in general have been slighted. Whether this is due to the enthnocentrism that accompanies being the "number one world power", to a monumental language barrier or to other reasons, the fact remains that the West has been culturally isolated from much of Asia, especially China.

As students of anthropology, with an interest in China, we have become aware of the paucity of materials available to the Western scholars interested in Chinese studies. In an attempt to bridge this gap the following project was undertaken. This project is by no means the entire bridge, but instead is one brick that we hope along with many others can be cemented together in spanning the gap between East and West.

In China, since the establishment of the Peoples Republic of China in 1949, one of the most successful scholastic pursuits has been the study of archaeology. Thousands of articles have been published which range in topic from the origins of Chinese civilization to the manufacture of porcelain; from the evidence showing ties between prehistoric and ethnic groups within the country to relics that demonstrate early contact between China and foreign countries; from the construction of ancient cities to the development of agricultural tools.

These publications and articles are not only a "must" for the understanding of Chinese civilization, they are also indispensible for a better understanding of the development of world civilization. Unfortunately, for the Westerner, the majority of these publications were written in Chinese.

Aware of both, the importance of these articles and the language barrier for most American scholars, we decided to translate and compile an index to the main articles and books that have been published from 1949 through 1965. Two main sources have been used. One was the extensive bibliography (455 entries) in Hsia Nai's The Archaeology of New China (新中国的考古收獲), a book that thoroughly reviewed all of the important archaeological works between 1949 and 1961. The other was K'ao Ku, the monthly official bulletin published by the Institute of Archaeology, Academy of Science, Peking. All the main entries and several minor ones are included from 1959 to 1965. During the Cultural Revolution K'ao Ku was not published (between mid 1966 and 1972). The articles published in 1966 and beginning again in 1972 were not included in this volume, but we hope to include them in a supplementary volume in the future.

Several articles were not translated and indexed because we felt that they were outside the scope of this work, e.g. reports of foreign studies outside China, foreign inscriptions on tomb stones or some of the political entries.

Certain problems were encountered during the translation. The variety of writing styles in Chinese has made uniform translation into English difficult, for example, the term Tiao Ch'a (調查) and T'a Ch'a (踏 查) have been translated interchangeably into "survey" or "reconnaissance" to fit the context of the title. In some cases the title itself did not pinpoint the location and/or the time period of the site it dealt with. In that case we had to go into the article itself or if the article was not available to resort to our knowledge of Chinese geography and history and make our best judgement.

The index is arranged chronologically by time period and dynasty with geographic subdivisions. The entries are then arranged according to the date of publication. For example, an article dealing with the Yangshao Culture in Honan published in '62 will be listed before one dealing with the Yangsaao Culture in Kansu published in '61 and both will be listed before an article about Lungshan tools from Shantung. If you are interested in the extent of Han discoveries check under the Han time period province by province.

To facilitate the use of this Index a chart showing the chronology of Chinese civilization (Figure 1), a list of the political subdivisions (Figure 2) and a map (Figure 3) that shows location of these political subdivisions and the main rivers and cities are provided.

Finally, we would like to thank Dr. William T. Ross, Director of the Asian Studies Center at Michigan State University, for his help and encouragement in making this work possible.
